Provenance

Bromen van 1644 and 1645, the same view series remained complete up to the same degree in the Nationalmuseum as in the Royal Museum in the Hague. One of the paintings from the Amsterdam exhibition was also shown in the Dutch Binnenhof and in the Dutch Rijksmuseum in Amsterdam. A large number of them on loan from the Swartbroekx Museum. The series was not seen by van Goyen, but continued by his father and his father-in-law Erasmus von Engert. A "Dr. Meyer" bought the painting and in 1901 introduced it to the Nationalmuseum in Stockholm.

On 20th June 1990, the painting was returned to Goudstikker's heiress. In November 2007, it was sold at auction in Amsterdam for $2,379,000. The painting is owned by the Nationalmuseum in Stockholm. The canvas was sold at auction in Vienna on 5th June 1871 under the title "Ansicht von Delft". The painting was thus left behind. With him was an inventory notebook "in lieu of inheritance tax" from Colonel Sir Joseph James Weld's general years later by the Sussex police. "H.M. Government" recovered the picture on September 9, 2008 for £915,000. The painting is owned by the Nationalmuseum in Stockholm.

In the spring of 2007 the painting was returned to Goudstikker's heiress, along with two hundred and one other art works that had been placed in "lieu of inheritance tax" by the Sussex police. The painting was thus left behind. With him was a copy of the book "Black Book" recording the pictures left in his gallery. In 1945, the book was returned to the Goudstikker family's claim of what remained of their collection began. The rest of the collection (estimated at 1,400 art works) was bequeathed to the Nationalmuseum in Stockholm, the Stockholm Division of the Swedish Institute, and the Nationalmuseum in Sweden.

In 1935, the "Black Book" of the Goudstikker Collection was published. In 1945, the book was returned to the Goudstikker family's claim of what remained of their collection began. The rest of the collection (estimated at 1,400 art works) was bequeathed to the Nationalmuseum in Stockholm, the Stockholm Division of the Swedish Institute, and the Nationalmuseum in Sweden.

In 1939, the "Black Book" of the Goudstikker Collection was published. In 1945, the book was returned to the Goudstikker family's claim of what remained of their collection began. The rest of the collection (estimated at 1,400 art works) was bequeathed to the Nationalmuseum in Stockholm, the Stockholm Division of the Swedish Institute, and the Nationalmuseum in Sweden.

In 1939, the "Black Book" of the Goudstikker Collection was published. In 1945, the book was returned to the Goudstikker family's claim of what remained of their collection began. The rest of the collection (estimated at 1,400 art works) was bequeathed to the Nationalmuseum in Stockholm, the Stockholm Division of the Swedish Institute, and the Nationalmuseum in Sweden.

In 1939, the "Black Book" of the Goudstikker Collection was published. In 1945, the book was returned to the Goudstikker family's claim of what remained of their collection began. The rest of the collection (estimated at 1,400 art works) was bequeathed to the Nationalmuseum in Stockholm, the Stockholm Division of the Swedish Institute, and the Nationalmuseum in Sweden.

In 1939, the "Black Book" of the Goudstikker Collection was published. In 1945, the book was returned to the Goudstikker family's claim of what remained of their collection began. The rest of the collection (estimated at 1,400 art works) was bequeathed to the Nationalmuseum in Stockholm, the Stockholm Division of the Swedish Institute, and the Nationalmuseum in Sweden.

In 1939, the "Black Book" of the Goudstikker Collection was published. In 1945, the book was returned to the Goudstikker family's claim of what remained of their collection began. The rest of the collection (estimated at 1,400 art works) was bequeathed to the Nationalmuseum in Stockholm, the Stockholm Division of the Swedish Institute, and the Nationalmuseum in Sweden.

In 1939, the "Black Book" of the Goudstikker Collection was published. In 1945, the book was returned to the Goudstikker family's claim of what remained of their collection began. The rest of the collection (estimated at 1,400 art works) was bequeathed to the Nationalmuseum in Stockholm, the Stockholm Division of the Swedish Institute, and the Nationalmuseum in Sweden.

In 1939, the "Black Book" of the Goudstikker Collection was published. In 1945, the book was returned to the Goudstikker family's claim of what remained of their collection began. The rest of the collection (estimated at 1,400 art works) was bequeathed to the Nationalmuseum in Stockholm, the Stockholm Division of the Swedish Institute, and the Nationalmuseum in Sweden.

In 1939, the "Black Book" of the Goudstikker Collection was published. In 1945, the book was returned to the Goudstikker family's claim of what remained of their collection began. The rest of the collection (estimated at 1,400 art works) was bequeathed to the Nationalmuseum in Stockholm, the Stockholm Division of the Swedish Institute, and the Nationalmuseum in Sweden.

In 1939, the "Black Book" of the Goudstikker Collection was published. In 1945, the book was returned to the Goudstikker family's claim of what remained of their collection began. The rest of the collection (estimated at 1,400 art works) was bequeathed to the Nationalmuseum in Stockholm, the Stockholm Division of the Swedish Institute, and the Nationalmuseum in Sweden.

In 1939, the "Black Book" of the Goudstikker Collection was published. In 1945, the book was returned to the Goudstikker family's claim of what remained of their collection began. The rest of the collection (estimated at 1,400 art works) was bequeathed to the Nationalmuseum in Stockholm, the Stockholm Division of the Swedish Institute, and the Nationalmuseum in Sweden.

In 1939, the "Black Book" of the Goudstikker Collection was published. In 1945, the book was returned to the Goudstikker family's claim of what remained of their collection began. The rest of the collection (estimated at 1,400 art works) was bequeathed to the Nationalmuseum in Stockholm, the Stockholm Division of the Swedish Institute, and the Nationalmuseum in Sweden.

In 1939, the "Black Book" of the Goudstikker Collection was published. In 1945, the book was returned to the Goudstikker family's claim of what remained of their collection began. The rest of the collection (estimated at 1,400 art works) was bequeathed to the Nationalmuseum in Stockholm, the Stockholm Division of the Swedish Institute, and the Nationalmuseum in Sweden.

In 1939, the "Black Book" of the Goudstikker Collection was published. In 1945, the book was returned to the Goudstikker family's claim of what remained of their collection began. The rest of the collection (estimated at 1,400 art works) was bequeathed to the Nationalmuseum in Stockholm, the Stockholm Division of the Swedish Institute, and the Nationalmuseum in Sweden.

In 1939, the "Black Book" of the Goudstikker Collection was published. In 1945, the book was returned to the Goudstikker family's claim of what remained of their collection began. The rest of the collection (estimated at 1,400 art works) was bequeathed to the Nationalmuseum in Stockholm, the Stockholm Division of the Swedish Institute, and the Nationalmuseum in Sweden.

In 1939, the "Black Book" of the Goudstikker Collection was published. In 1945, the book was returned to the Goudstikker family's claim of what remained of their collection began. The rest of the collection (estimated at 1,400 art works) was bequeathed to the Nationalmuseum in Stockholm, the Stockholm Division of the Swedish Institute, and the Nationalmuseum in Sweden.

In 1939, the "Black Book" of the Goudstikker Collection was published. In 1945, the book was returned to the Goudstikker family's claim of what remained of their collection began. The rest of the collection (estimated at 1,400 art works) was bequeathed to the Nationalmuseum in Stockholm, the Stockholm Division of the Swedish Institute, and the Nationalmuseum in Sweden.

In 1939, the "Black Book" of the Goudstikker Collection was published. In 1945, the book was returned to the Goudstikker family's claim of what remained of their collection began. The rest of the collection (estimated at 1,400 art works) was bequeathed to the Nationalmuseum in Stockholm, the Stockholm Division of the Swedish Institute, and the Nationalmuseum in Sweden.

In 1939, the "Black Book" of the Goudstikker Collection was published. In 1945, the book was returned to the Goudstikker family's claim of what remained of their collection began. The rest of the collection (estimated at 1,400 art works) was bequeathed to the Nationalmuseum in Stockholm, the Stockholm Division of the Swedish Institute, and the Nationalmuseum in Sweden.